INTRODUCTION

Human creativity is far more abundant than generally imagined. People manifest creativity in their dreams, speech and social interactions, and in the hundreds of thousands of products, services, and activities they design and develop. Although the creative genius is rare and wonderful and must be nurtured, it is equally important both for persons and organisations to create conditions in which the masses can be creative. The creative individual tends to have considerable independence of judgment; rich, often bizarre imagination combined with a good deal of reality contact; openness to strange and complex situations, sensations, and ideas; and a need to contribute something distinctive, be a pioneer, and to actualize one's potential.
